The electric car revolution: is it realistic or optimistic? The advent of various new technologies is bringing a degree of hope in our fast-paced world that so one day we will become humanity will become a self-sufficient community, richly endowed with sustainable technologies. The same applies to the car industry: the introduction of electric vehicles has led ^{people} some to believe we would on soon see dispose of petrol, while others are taking a more jaundiced view of the new technology. It would be wrong to criticize those those who & admire this new technology and have no doubt as to its potential widespread adoption in the long run, for some slow, yet considerable progress in the car industry has already occurred. To start, some forms of battery recharging points have already sprung up across in developed European countries. Second, many car firms have done away incorporated electric-based designs in their cars. However, I believe that we still have a long way to go before we fully switch to electric cars. First of all, these a forementioned recharging points are still in their infancy and may not prove sustainable or suitable for certain cars. Moreover, oil tycoons will certainly attempt to hamper the development of alternative energy sources and block the electric cars' en widespread entry into the market. All in all, despite all the excitement surrounding the introduction of electric cars, a lot has to be done before humanity will embrace the future.	Количество слов: 226
