WHY YOU CAN'T SPOT A LIAR ONLY BY LOOKING

Police thought that 17-year-old Marty Tankleff seemed too calm after finding his mother stabbed to death and his father mortally wounded in the family home. Authorities didn't believe his claims of innocence, and he spent 17 years in prison for the murders. Yet in another case, detectives thought that 16-year-old Jeffrey Deskovic seemed too eager to help detectives after his high school classmate was found murdered. He, too, was judged to be lying and served nearly 16 years for the crime. One man was not upset enough. The other was too upset. How can such opposite feelings both be telltale clues of hidden guilt? In both cases the sentence was based on their behavior. There is widespread misconception that you can spot a liar by the way they act. Across cultures, people believe that behaviors such as averted gaze, changing posture are telltale clues that betray deceivers.

- In fact, it is wrong. Researchers have found little evidence to support this belief despite decades of searching. Psychologists have conducted a number of experiments which prove how hard it is to spot a liar only by looking. In 2003, psychologist Bella DePaulo and her colleagues gathered 116 experiments in scientific literature that compared people's behavior when lying and when telling the truth. The studies assessed 102 possible nonverbal clues, including averted gaze, blinking, talking louder, shrugging, shifting posture and movements of the head, hands, arms or legs. None proved reliable indicators of a liar. Three years later, she and psychologist Charles Bond of Texas Christian University reviewed 206 studies involving 24,483 observers judging the truthfulness of communications by volunteer individuals. Neither law enforcement experts nor student volunteers were able to pick true from false statements better than 54 percent of the time — just slightly above chance. In individual experiments, accuracy ranged from 31 to 73 percent. The results looked convincing. Police experts, however, have frequently disagreed with the conclusions claiming that the experiments weren't realistic enough. After all, they say, volunteers — mostly students — instructed to lie or tell the truth in psychology labs do not face the same consequences as criminal suspects in the interrogation room or on the witness stand. "The 'guilty' people had nothing at stake, it wasn't real motivation" says Joseph Buckley, criticising lab research.

- Samantha Mann, a psychologist at the University of Portsmouth, UK, thought that such police criticism had a point. To delve into the issue, she and colleague Aldert Vrij first went through hours of videotaped police interviews of a convicted serial killer and picked out three known truths and three known lies. Then Mann asked 65 English police officers to view the six statements and judge which were true, and which false. Since the interviews were in Dutch, the officers judged entirely on the basis of nonverbal clues. The officers were right 64 percent of the time — better than chance, but still not very accurate. And the officers who did worst were those who said they relied on nonverbal stereotypes like "liars look away" or "liars don't sit still." In fact, the killer-maintained eye contact and did not fidget while deceiving. "This guy was clearly very nervous, no doubt," Mann says, but he controlled his behavior to strategically counter the stereotypes. In a later study, also by Mann and Vrij, 52 Dutch police officers did no better than chance at distinguishing true and false statements given by family members who'd murdered their relatives but denied it in anguished displays during televised press conferences used in the study. Notably, officers who performed the worst were those who felt that the emotional displays were sincere. It only shows that nonverbal behavior can be interpreted in different ways. If you focus on the nonverbal behavior like emotions, you are likely to make a mistake. This was proved in Mann's recent experiment in 2019.
- In this study Mann examined nonverbal behaviour of a person trying to conceal illegal activity — a type of deception relevant to detecting bombers or smugglers. She recruited 52 university student volunteers and asked half of them to transport a laptop said to contain secret data on a ferry ride between two cities. The volunteers were told to try to blend into the crowd and not look "suspicious," because people would be trying to identify them. The other half of the group were given a regular cell phone to transport, with no instructions to conceal what they were doing. When Mann showed videos of the ferry rides to 104 other volunteers and asked them to pick out the "smugglers," the spotters did no better than chance. In interviews afterward, the "smugglers" said they were nervous, but they consciously tried to act normal and control their nerves with tactics such as listening to music or using their phones.
- Next, Mann sent more volunteers on a ferry ride - 60, half of the group of "smugglers" had an envelope with foreign money to hide, the other half didn't carry anything illegal. Two researchers were sent onto the ferry too and scrutinize the passengers, appearing to compare their faces to photos on a mobile phone. This time the "smugglers" on video were guessed correctly only 39.2 percent of the time — well below chance – because they made a great effort to look normal, while the “innocent” control volunteers were naturally surprised and confused by the unexpected attention, which was regarded as a sign of guilt. The finding that deceivers can successfully hide nervousness fills in a missing piece in deception research. There is great difference between people’s internal emotions with what others notice: liars do feel more nervous, but that’s an internal feeling and is not observed by others. Studies like these have led researchers to largely abandon the hunt for nonverbal clues to deception. But are there other ways to spot a liar? It seems there are.

- Today, psychologists investigating deception are more likely to focus on verbal clues, and particularly on ways to magnify the differences between what liars and truth-tellers say. For example, interviewers can strategically question the suspects longer, allowing them to speak more freely, which can lead liars into contradictions. In one experiment, using this technique 41 police trainees correctly identified liars about 85 percent of the time, as compared to 55 percent for another 41 recruits who had not yet received the training in this technique. It demonstrates significant improvement in accuracy rates. Another interviewing technique taps spatial memory by asking suspects and witnesses to sketch a scene related to a crime or alibi. Because this enhances recall, truth-tellers may report more detail. Experiments have demonstrated that people who are telling the truth happen to give 76 percent more detail about experiences at the location during a sketching interview than those asked to hide the information. With the view to spotting a liar these practices – long questioning and a sketching interview - are already used by UK police. However, the change is very slow and policemen and agents still receive a behavioral checklist, which instructs to look for a supposed liar paying attention to averted gaze, prolonged stare, rapid blinking, complaining, whistling, exaggerated yawning, covering the mouth while speaking and excessive fidgeting on the chair. All have been thoroughly criticized by researchers.

In order to spot a liar it is more reasonable to focus on verbal clues.

The officers who were the best at spotting deception were those who said they relied on non-verbal stereotypes like "liars look away" or "liars don't sit still".

Текст вопроса

You have read the article "Why You Can't Spot a Liar". Put these events in the correct chronological order.

- It is a worrying fact that unfair sentences may be a result of misinterpretation of nonverbal behavior of the suspects. Representatives of legal professions and ordinary people are convinced that a liar can be spotted by the way he acts. However, it is wrong. A number of experiments have proven that it is hardly possible to identify a liar by looking.
- One of the first experiments of this kind conducted by Bella DePaolo and her colleagues did not find nonverbal clues reliable in identifying deception. Three years later Bella DePaolo expanded her lab experiment and had two groups of observers: students and police experts. They were to pick true statements from false. Neither group did better than 54% of the time. Police experts believed that the experiment failed because it was not realistic and "guilty" volunteers were just following the instructions. Policemen were highly critical of lab experiments on the whole.
- In response to this criticism Samanta Mann and Aldert Vrij carried out a telling experiment: English police officers saw real, not lab interviews with Dutch convicts and judged which statements were true, which were false. The result of the judgment based entirely on nonverbal clues was a little over 60%. The officers who relied on nonverbal stereotypes did the worst, proving behavioral clues misleading. Another experiment of Samanta Mann demonstrated that basing the judgment on emotions that suspects demonstrate is likely to lead to mistakes. Mann went on to study the behavior of those trying to conceal illegal activity.
- Thus, in 2019 she divided volunteers into two groups: "smugglers", who believed they had a laptop with something illegal, and those who had no instructions to conceal anything. The "criminals" were picked only 50% of the time. It is interesting to note that in the next experiment of Samanta Mann "the smugglers" knew they were under suspicion and made even greater effort to look normal. The “criminals” thoroughly controlled their nonverbal behavior and were guessed correctly only 39,2% of the time. The conclusion was made that nonverbal behavior cannot help in detecting deception and it would be better to focus on verbal clues.

- In order to get these verbal clues it is recommended to question suspects longer as it may lead liars into contradictions. Another technique is a sketching interview, during which truth tellers tend to give more detail, whereas liars do not. Unfortunately, such new practices are not used widely and police officers still base their judgment on nonverbal clues handed out to them in a form of behavioral checklist.

2	25/03/24, 15:21:15	Сохранено: A while ago, I have read an article called "Why Cant You Spot a Liar". I got fascinated in this article, and now Id like to give a commentary on it. In the beginning of the text two examples of crimes are given. Police thought it was two students who committed them because they were behaving suspiciously. One was too upset, and the other - not upset enough. They both served time in a prison for the crimes that they did not possibly commit. I wonder if it is easy to hide the crime. Psychologists conducted researches on the behaviour of people that needed to hide the truth. They were suggested to blend in and behave like everyone else so that they cannot be found. After the research the subjects said that they were nervous distracting themselves. The next experiment was conducted on the basis of a video recording of the interrogation of the criminals. It showed that most people had stereotypical thinking. They thought that a human committed a crime cannot be calm. And emotions can be deceptive. Really, the research was confirmed. But policemen didnt agree with science thinking that in real life everything is not like in experiments. A human who committed a crime knows he will be punished and his emotions become stronger. Now I can go to my opinion about liar-spotting. Everyone lies... Little children lie because they are afraid of a punishment. Adults lie justifying that its a lie for salvation. Lie has become an epidemic and it is very difficult to spot a liar. However, it does not mean its impossible. A liar CAN be spotted because he breaths nervously, sweats and stuff like that. Only special detectors can spot a professional liar. So little children are easier to catch in a lie. For example, my younger brother cut my shirt	Ответ сохранен and did not confess it. But my parents always know when children lie to them. They could expose him, according to his behaviour. Then he confessed and was ashamed for the lie. I think that having needed equipment, psychology knowledge, you can easily spot a liar. Though to a common person its a bit more difficult. Thats all I meant to say.

Victory over Spain The defeat of the Armada was the largest and the most important engagement of the undeclared Anglo-Spanish War, which started in (042. _____). When Elizabeth I succeeded her half-sister (043. _____) England swung to (044. _____). The faith of Elizabeth's sister had led her to a close relation with her cousin and husband (045. _____) of Spain, whose aim was to extend his rule over England. Following his wife's death, and after years of increasing hostility, the Spanish king decided to end Elizabeth's reign through the power of the Spanish Armada, a mighty fleet of warships. English ships were (046. _____), still England relied on the captains, who were brave and clever. Firstly, (047. _____) made a surprise raid on the Spanish fleet at the coast of Spain, which set back the Spanish plans for a year. Then, a year later the English saw the Armada approaching and signaled its arrival, so their fleet was once more caught by surprise in the (048. _____) and English superior artillery scattered the Armada in the stormy (049. _____). There the Spanish fleet sailed up the east coast of England meaning to round the tip of (050. _____) into the Atlantic, where much of their fleet was lost to shipwreck. Over 20000 Spanish sailors lost their lives while the English lost no ship and only (051. _____) men.
